We recently got into a Skype session with him, and we're trying to talk him out of this idea. I'll try and summarise what he told me. He needs to monitor his websites via an API. He does this via Google App Engine, which gives him some transparency as to how his websites are doing and an API interface to use this monitoring. The total traffic to his sites is around 300 - 400GB. A web server would handle this well enough, but he's just getting pushed to his capacity and he wants to push some more and stay under the server's physical capacity. The sites all serve static data, so the overhead should be fairly low. We discussed having a cluster of servers, and that the load-balancing would be done through DNS. Our questions are: Is this even possible? Can you mix and match clustered and non-clustered servers? (We don't have access to the network gear to actually test this out) If this is possible, would DNS work? Would we be able to round-robin between servers/sites so that, for example, would load-balance between servers. And then would load-balance between servers again? A: This is possible, and you can do it all with DNS. The cluster of servers must be able to communicate with each other, but they don't have to be able to talk directly to the internet. Let's say that your DNS entry for domain.com points to server1.domain.com. Clients can query DNS and get the name server for the domain for their sub-domain. This means that the clients will think that they can reach server1.domain.com directly. You can test this by setting up a DNS forwarder that will forward requests for to server1.domain.com.
