Deal Reached With Verizon On Payphones The federal government has reached an agreement with Verizon (VZ) regarding the so called "payphone" business model. Part of the settlement involves the deployment of remote access units (RADs) to hundreds of thousands of payphones. The Justice Department claimed it was forcing Verizon to convert payphones into digital second generation (2G) cellphone units, but the FCC felt this was not the case. The FCC has asked Verizon to deploy RADs to the payphones over the next two years. This deal puts to rest one of the last major arguments being taken against the proposed merger between AT&T (T) and T-Mobile. In that proposed merger, it was argued that the payphone business model would be a threat to the wireless phone industry, but this settlement shows that the two wireless companies have found a way to co-exist. The FCC also launched an investigation into the wireless industry about two months ago and has now completed its investigation. The FCC said it did not find any evidence that payphones would pose a competitive threat. I have reported on this issue over the years. As recently as last month, the FCC was debating a plan that would extend the reach of the paid wireless network. This issue always seems to come up after the fact, but the fact that the FCC is not doing anything about it is more proof that the payphone business model is simply there to leach off of our wireless network. It is one thing for the wireless carriers to let the FCC know that they are not going to compete with the payphones. It is quite another that the FCC will not do anything to protect the payphone business model. As electronic components have become smaller, the packaging density of electronic components has increased. With the increased packaging density, the number of solder joints to be connected has increased. It becomes more difficult to inspect the quality of the solder joints by visual inspection. Therefore, there is a need to inspect the quality of the solder joints. The following methods can be used to inspect the quality of the solder joints. One method is to analyze the appearance of solder bumps after solder reflow 3e33713323
