Factors influencing postoperative recovery after colorectal surgery: a multicenter prospective observational study. Inability to wake up from postoperative sleep could lead to adverse clinical events in patients who have undergone colorectal surgery. It is important to identify the factors that have an influence on postoperative sleep quality, and thus, patient morbidity. Prospective study. Twenty-six hospitals. A total of 2293 patients who had undergone colorectal surgery were enrolled in the study. Postoperative sleep quality was assessed using the Epworth Sleepiness Scale (ESS) immediately postoperatively and on postoperative days 3, 5, and 7. Sleep quality was assessed by the patient and the surgeon at each step of the study period. Factors associated with postoperative sleep quality were investigated using multivariate logistic regression. Postoperative mortality was 0.9%. The ESS scores significantly increased at each time point, peaking on postoperative day 7. The overall incidence of 'poor' sleep quality was 13.5%, and was significantly associated with both the ESS scores and patient anxiety/depression scores. Multivariate logistic regression analysis identified the following as independent factors associated with poor postoperative sleep quality: postoperative ileus, high body mass index, preoperative smoking, high ESS scores, and patient anxiety/depression. Both patient and surgeon-reported parameters can be used to predict postoperative sleep quality after colorectal surgery. Recovery of sleep quality should be assessed not only by the patient, but also by the surgeon.
