1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to an ophthalmic measurement apparatus. More specifically, this invention relates to an ophthalmic measurement apparatus with which the axial length of the eyeball of an examinee's eye is measured non-invasively by the use of a near infrared light as a measurement light. 2. Description of the Related Art Recently, in ophthalmic medical institutions, ophthalmic measurement apparatuses have been developed which can be used to readily measure the axial length of the eye of an examinee's eye, so as to assist in the non-invasive determination of refractive power. The measurement principle of these apparatuses can be briefly explained as follows: in the case where a single beam of near infrared light is divided into two light fluxes by a beam splitter, one of the two light fluxes is applied to a cornea of an examinee's eye via a non-contact optical system, while the other is applied to the cornea via a contact optical system. When the light flux applied to the cornea of the examinee's eye travels through the cornea and lens of the examinee's eye, a wavefront of light is generated. The wavefront of light having been generated forms a converging spot on the retina of the examinee's eye. The wavefront light having been generated is focused on the retina of the examinee's eye via a fundus mirror, so as to form a spot. The spot that has been focused on the retina is used for the measurement of the wavefront of light. In addition, the converging spot formed on the retina of the examinee's eye is also detected as an image on an image sensor element that is provided on the imaging plane of the ophthalmic measurement apparatus. The position of the converging spot is detected, and the axial length of the eyeball of the examinee's eye is determined on the basis of the detected position. A problem with the ophthalmic measurement apparatus described above is that light that has not traveled through the cornea of the examinee's eye is detected. For example, light that has been absorbed by blood in the capillary network is detected. As a method of removing this problem, Japanese Patent Kokai No. 2007-235462 proposes a method of removing the problem by measuring the axial length of the eye, and determining whether or not the measured axial length is approximately equal to a target axial length.
