It's a mature product with a decent codebase, but the application is still used by a small number of customers for a period of time and we noticed some problems with usability of the front-end: most of users were using the application to add new documents, but to view and edit existing documents was another story. The whole process is pretty straightforward, but for the customer to keep his documents organized and well-structured, we implemented many custom checks and actions, which require quite a lot of work and monitoring of the application. The developer's workflow is quite tedious as well: if the customer changes one single text in a document and send it to the application for the processing, then the developer must go over all the documents and check if there are any errors. The application is not really suitable for mobile development, and it is lacking an iPad app with a UI similar to the Windows App. Still, the front-end is the most important part, so we started to look for a possible solution that would make the workflow of the development process more simple and easier for the developer. The solution The solution is to use a JavaScript library for managing document libraries: QuasarJS. It's a perfect solution for front-end development as it's easy to integrate with the Node.js backend, there's a high-level documentation, and you can choose between single-page or multi-page documents. The idea was to have a JavaScript front-end for the application that would connect to our Node.js back-end and would be a presentation layer for all documents, so that when a user logs in and opens the application, all his documents are already organized and well-structured. The application would download the front-end files from our server, connect to the back
