Description: Assassins Creed Syndicate-CODEX License Key. Assignment. A Thief's Work (2016) Mobile Client v4.1.1Q: I have stumped my casperJS since yesterday This will probably be answered on SO (if you happen to have the same problem), but I was hoping someone could help me figure out where I screwed up on this simple node script. The issue is simple: I am trying to write a nodejs script to scrape a website, and set a value to a variable within a different script. The issue is after the remoteCmd, I get an undefined variable error... First off, here is the node script: var casper = require('casper').create(); var ip; casper.start("", function() { ip = this.getTitle(); }); Then here is the second script which uses the first script: var async = require('async'); async.waterfall([function(callback){ //set up the variable to hold the ip ip = IP; console.log('end'); callback(); }, function(callback) { //the website to scrape console.log(""+ip); callback(); }], function (err) { console.log('ERROR:'+ err); }); What am I doing

Is it fine to use a single model for categories, and for each node, there is a parent_id? If so, how would you design a save/load, so I can keep track of the parent_id? A drop down that you can select to move from one category to another. In this example, lets say I have Model: Category # id # name Model: Node # id # parent_id There would be a lots of categories. A: In Django, it is usually best to have the Category model as representing a category, with the parent_id set to None. You would probably use the ForeignKey relationship here. If you do find yourself needing to save the relationship between a Node and its parent, you can add a ManyToMany relationship to yourself that also stores the parent_id. From the user-facing side, you can use a SelectListField to store any parameters relating to a particular model's parent: select = models.ForeignKey('self', on_delete=models.CASCADE, blank=True) You will then be able to specify the parent using: select = models.ForeignKey('self', on_delete=models.CASCADE, blank=True) Thus, in your template, you can access any of the params using: {% for node in node_list %} {{ node.id }} {{ node.select }} {% endfor %} And, finally, in your Node model, you can specify
