More Ice Cream that the Kids will Eat Do you have kids who don't eat much? They're fussy eaters? Who are picky eaters? Who don't like vegetables? These are common signs that you could have a slower, less active child on your hands. Whether your fussy eater is 3 or 13, there's a fix-it for them. They're sick of being miserable and complaining and just want to be happy for one blissful fleeting moment when they get real food in their bellies. At end of the day though, their mood usually returns to neutral and they're back to complaining about being sad or uncomfortably hungry. Here's The Truth About Your Fussy Eater: Here's The Truth About Your Fussy Eater: Cookies are bad. Lots of our readers are actually members of Team Cookies. On the other hand, Eggs are awesome and wonderfully filling and nutritious. Eggs also emit a delicious smell that is magnetic to babies and small children, especially at the beginning of the day or on a vacation when there is no chance to go grocery shopping. Your child actually does not care about whether it's eggs or cookie dough as long as there is some form of delicious foods in their bellies. How Do I Get My Kids to Eat More? Cook with them Cook with them is best because you can control the sense of obligation to both your child and the meal. You can even come up with creative names or play little games to get them to eat foods they don't like. Or they have someone else have them eat their veggies. It's harder to resist a mouth watering, delicious looking cookie than it is to resist, say, an apple, even when Mom and Dad are both urging you to eat the apple. If your kid's food tastes bad, hold the food in your hand and put it in your mouth while your kid is hungry and staring in judgment. Serve smaller portions "You're too
