Driver and Student Media: The E-Toward Project This project was funded by the US Department of Education's Office of Educational Technology as part of the Connected Learning Network (CLN). Sponsored by the Office of Educational Technology (OET), Connected Learning Network (CLN) is a collaboration between the OET, CTO (College of Teacher Education), and the Office of Educational Technology (OET) at UNE. This is a partnership to build a strong collaboration to develop and test innovative technology to better connect the higher education and educational profession to the community. Modern electronic equipment can consume large amounts of power. Therefore, it is common to use one or more power supplies to provide regulated power for various electronic devices, such as an electronic computer. The power supplies typically include a power supply unit having a power input and a power output, a switching network connected to the power input, and a power regulation circuit connected to the power output. Some power supplies use Pulse Width Modulation (PWM) circuitry to generate a square wave with a variable frequency and pulse width. Such switching circuitry is suitable for generating a variable output voltage at the power output that closely tracks the input voltage. The circuit output voltage is then regulated by a power regulation circuit that compares the output voltage with a reference voltage and adjusts the switching frequency and pulse width in an attempt to maintain the output voltage within acceptable tolerance limits. The power regulation circuit generally includes a comparator, such as a differential amplifier, connected between the output of the power supply and an error voltage circuit to provide a feedback loop. The error voltage circuit senses the
