“Our goal was to create a more authentic and immersive football experience, and we did that by bringing real-world player movement data into the game,” said Matt Prior, Executive Producer at EA Canada. “HyperMotion Technology allows players to feel the effects of the physics and collisions that happen in actual matches. We worked with the Players Union and Professional Football League to validate the player reactions, and then we fed that data directly into the game, to let players know if they’re making the right decision.” Players will need to conduct themselves ethically and responsibly in real life, and that includes protecting their health through physical activity, diet and other long-term habits. “We already collect and manage a great deal of player movement data, as part of both our digital and live competitions,” said Barry Cottle, Director of Sports Innovation and Player Optimization at EA Sports. “With the use of raw data for HyperMotion Technology, there are numerous opportunities to really engage with fans and players using that data, helping to enhance authenticity and immersion. The number of real-life challenges that we collect in games, from the accelerometer-level data that allows us to feel players’ weight and the position of their body, to input from the gamepad and motion tracking, is as much as eight gigabytes per match. This means we have a trove of data that we can take full advantage of, and so we are excited about the potential for live and virtual match data to continue to expand.” HyperMotion Technology is in Fifa 22 Cracked Version and FIFA Ultimate Team. SPEED CONTROL Using Real World Motions: Fifa 22 Serial Key introduces acceleration and turning data from real-world matches, providing a more authentic feel to gameplay. In-game footage played with acceleration data has been shown to create less lag, allow for better ball control and allow for more aggressive play. The use of acceleration also creates noticeable differences in ball control depending on the player’s weight, where agility allows players to accelerate the ball more easily. Using Player Anthropometry: The weight of players, along with the size and shape of a player’s limbs and body are important factors that can be captured in the game to accurately recreate the actions of a player. Experimentation: A range of tests were conducted to validate the use of player motions in the game
