These junction boxes are either grounded or ungrounded, with the grounded type generally being better in use due to the voltage drop and noise in ungrounded boxes. A junction box such as one of the type described above with 2 flat blades extending upwardly and outwardly at an angle to the chassis can usually be included in the design of the box, however such an arrangement limits the depth of the box to a reasonable proportion of the height, making the box somewhat bulky. It has been known for some time that the socket outlets in the United

Foiling (LRFI) was invented by NASA in the early 1980s and has been used on several space vehicles since. Over twenty different LRFI designs have been created for manned and unmanned space vehicles. A LRFI infuses a pre-specified amount of additional fuel per second over the intended total amount of time of flight during atmospheric reentry. The result is a reduction in the entry velocity of the vehicle through the atmosphere. LRFI is a
