What's new in Mask Of The Rose:

is a world-wide integration of artists and authors producing high-quality works of art and literature that differ from one other yet are united by a common theme. Representing artists of both urban and non-urban communities, as well as those who make the transition from one to the other, the unique range of artists who support the effort offer alternative ideas on contemporary life that question standard, neophyte imagery. Mask of the Rose is dedicated to the free exchange of news and commentary on a diverse and global community of individuals who strive to create a different reality.

Flawed Opposition Groups The streets of Juba, South Sudan (Photo: Chris Dale) Since the independence of South Sudan, over one million people (over 60 per cent of the country's population) have been internally displaced within South Sudan; over half of these people have been displaced since July 2011.[1] The country's population is largely based in urban areas; most of the country's small, family-run, subsistence farmers live in rural areas.[2] Over half of the farmers in South Sudan rely on rain-fed agriculture to produce and sustain both their families and their communities.[3] Those who remain in their villages tend to specialise in only a few areas of subsistence work, including cultivation, hunting, and collection of herbs to help treat illnesses, use as dyes, and other purposes, while others have become nomadic in order to find a source of money.[4] For communities in rural areas, these activities can be their most important sources of income.[5] The United Nations describes all of these people as refugees or internally displaced persons (IDPs). Most of these people are living with an interrupted life and are not able to provide for their families, who are relying mostly on food distributed by government-run relief organisations (Rwandan and Pan-African Red Cross).[6] A lack of services and material goods means that family members are separated as refugees and IDPs live in different settlements, often without reliable access to adequate resources.[7] The United Nations defines an IDP as anyone who has been forced or obliged to leave their usual place of residence or to leave their country or any part of it in order to escape from one or more identified conflict situations and seeking a place where their life, safety, and security could be ensured.[8] Before South Sudan became independent in July 2011 and the subsequent onset of conflict, civilians mostly lived in rural areas.[9] In Juba
