The Growth of Bogus Pension Studies The Growth of Bogus Pension Studies The graphs show a growth of bogus studies in the past, like those cited in the book "The Trouble With The Aged" (see A falsified graph that was published in the Financial Times [FT] is by now pretty well known. The FT ran a graph that claimed the amount of industrial and scientific pensions in Britain has fallen in 15 years, from a high of 84.6% in 1996 to 79.4% in 2006 (article at and But the real growth of industrial and scientific pensions is much more than 15% in 15 years, and much more than in any OECD member country. And the much higher growth of the falsified graph is significant in itself, as even the conservative FT can not completely deny it. What does that tell us? First, that bogus studies are or at least can easily be published. Second, that bogus studies are then being used to call for austerity- and privatization-policies. In the book "The Trouble With The Aged" ( the author already mentioned the following: "Then there is the issue of ethics. The 77.5 per cent figure has been cited by financial advisers as an argument for drastic cuts in pensions. The reality is that it is highly unlikely that the figure of a fifth of the workforce in the OECD says anything much about the size of the British pension system. It is just another example of the misreporting of statistics used by vested interest groups to achieve political goals." The OECD even acknowledged such lobbying: "Mischel (2004) finds that several reports listed

What's New in the Photoshop 2022 (version 23)?

The Kremlin's new presidential order on counter-terrorism that was announced on July 25 has sparked fierce debate in Russia, but has so far received only lukewarm attention outside the country. It further expanded the powers of the Investigative Committee, Russia's key security agency, and allowed it to launch criminal prosecutions of undesirable persons on its own initiative. "In these new measures, a certain degree of centralisation is visible," Gennady Gudkov, a senator and former member of parliament, told the Guardian. "In my opinion, the order is a serious constitutional development and should be amended." The legislation, signed by the Russian president Vladimir Putin on July 25 and published in Russian state media on July 27, had been reported as having been drafted by the Investigative Committee and backed by the security services. But it now also points to the authorisation of the FSB, Russia's main security agency, which is one of the "powers" that the committee "affirms" and names as the principal organ of Russia's system of national security. "The law has institutionalised this, giving the [state security] services control over [its own] investigative organs – that is, the organs of the Investigative Committee," said Mr Gudkov. "It is obvious that the FSB is in a worse situation than it has ever been before. In previous editions of the same law, the FSB had been involved in its drafting. It has now become the main power in the security sphere.” The change is significant. The Investigative Committee is the main body of Russia’s law enforcement and legal system, and was set up in 2003 as a separate body from the FSB as part of the clampdown on corruption that followed the financial collapse of Russia’s sovereign wealth fund, Sberbank, in 1998. The new order has raised fears it will again be “rehabilitated”, leaving security services wielding near-dictatorial power, and leaving only Russia’s prosecutor general, Yury Chaika, as an independent watchdog, in a country where there are few such positions. Initially, the law was criticised as “too broad” and “heavy-handed” for encroaching on fundamental freedoms, while also pointing to potential abuses by the security services, and as giving them almost unlimited power in pursuing their investigations and
