Weeks after Donald Trump won the presidential election, and weeks before he moves into the White House, the Democratic Party is planning a resistance to the new administration. Nearly 70 Democratic lawmakers have signed on to an open letter pleading with President Barack Obama to resist some of the plans outlined by the new administration, including limiting non-Christian speech, undercutting economic growth, and protecting free speech for "hateful ideologies." The members of Congress are already pledging to work together and maintain the best of Obama's legacy, including through the Affordable Care Act. But many will move beyond Obama's legacy and campaign for changes on the environment, immigration, and beyond. "Many of the bedrock principles that have made America the greatest country in the history of the world will be under assault," the letter says. "We must be faithful to our values and those values cannot include discrimination, or bigotry or racist ideologies or intolerance that are repugnant." The letter comes just weeks after Trump won the White
