What's new in Time Idle RPG:

Track World Championship begins Saturday, with the qualification races for the start of the race itself on Sunday. Another milestone has been attained in the world of Forge tracks as the Shields become the first manufactured cube (the Chris Valigura v75 model) made. "I think it's a fairly safe bet that the first ever Forge track to be built was the Stadler prototype which was built in 2012", said Forge engineer and chief modeller Dean Denniss. "Since then, we've had some great designs which raised the bar for what can be done with Forge tracks", he added. New Track System - the first change coming to the Define track in the DMS Forge-21 program, being released for public playing soon. As some of you may know, Forge-21 will be officially launching in December 2012. To accompany the program, DMS Forge has put in the work to develop 3 new track systems: one of which is a track system based on the Forge World System. The new track is in testing and will be released for public play soon, once it's ready, assuming the DMS Forge team can finish testing it up. The main difference is that the tracks are modular - you can easily remove a track and add another to the end where you like. As a result, we have ended up with Forge track rules being rewritten to add in modularity, but other than that the Forge track rules will remain the same as in 3.5 (this isn't something that will necessarily be the case with the Forge rules in Forge-21 as we end up controlling the Forge distribution). What will this mean for Forge play? I'm hoping to have rules for 3.5 Forge and Forge-21 next week, but I don't think they will have much in common. They'll of course probably have similar rules in common. I mentioned this issue at Generocitya few months ago - in an ideal world the Forge rules and Forge-21 rules should be like a touch paper. If they don't look the same, then maybe we need to consider why Forge-21 is wanting to change the rules and why Forge should be left well alone. The Forge World System - such a successful track system, having been around for seven years and still going strong. The DMS Forge World System is a Forge track system inspired by Construct 2 technology. Changes have been made to the underlying equations that govern the properties of Forge tracks to make them similar to the Forge World System's naturally-occurring tracks
