A while back I started a new company called ZuluP.I.S. - they are launching a website today. ZuluP.I.S came about because I am an Information Security Consultant and also a Public Defender. In both of these roles I am constantly dealing with people who have done the wrong thing, or have been caught doing the wrong thing. So the thought of someone who has done the wrong thing being in a position of trust was quite shocking to me. And very disturbing. I am an Information Security Consultant and with this job I travel and meet a lot of people who are in positions of trust. I see something like this in all walks of life - people in positions of trust and responsibility are never taught how to behave. How to be professional and how to act when you are faced with a difficult situation. I knew of all the skills and mindset that I needed to be a good Information Security Consultant and how important they are to my day to day work. So I started to reflect on what I would do if I was faced with a situation where someone had broken trust and I wanted to determine if they should be trusted and work with them again? I have been designing systems for almost 20 years and building networks for almost as long. I already had this theory that I thought was logical and sensible. So I started to think what would happen if I wrote a blog post titled: "If you broke trust with a client" I kept the title close to what it would be if I really put my head into it and started to think of all the things that I would need to do to be professional if I was in this situation.

Then I started to write. I wrote every single word in the next several days and in the end I had over 1000 words written
