Bill Gates is also donating $22.6 billion to philanthropic causes that he has included in his will. The majority of that money will be set aside for a charitable foundation that will focus on global health and education. "The thing that has surprised me is how quickly the reaction has been there is just so broad a will to help," he said. "In an emergency, there can be a lot of waste and a lot of inefficiency. This seems to me to be an area where we have the most can do to really make a difference." "Right now the money is pretty well allocated for the most compelling charities," he added. "But we will see how the money performs and then we can add new ones." This is a sharp contrast from the approach of his older brother. Bill Gates also announced a large charitable contribution to the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation earlier this year. Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation is set to accomplish their goal of getting "good schools for everyone." Moreover, Bill Gates has also mentioned that he would like to finance a development of research into the applications of DNA technology in delivering new medications. "We are planning to enhance our work in diabetes and tuberculosis and malaria," he said. "Right now, malaria is going down in the U.S. but in the world, the high-grade malaria has really declined," he noted. "But there are still 6 million people dying from malaria every year. So, that's a big impact. We also think we can make a big contribution to contraception for women." The Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation aims to deliver good education to every single child, achieve food security worldwide, and fight the diseases affecting the most vulnerable families.
