[Evaluation of two rapid tests for the diagnosis of Shiga toxin in stool samples]. Clostridium difficile infection (CDI) is the major etiologic factor of nosocomial diarrhea in adults and frequently associated with hemolytic uremic syndrome (HUS). The diagnosis is based on clinical features, toxin detection in feces and confirmation of C. difficile infection by molecular methods. Several methods to detect C. difficile toxins (CTs) in stool samples are being used, including ELISA (enzyme-linked immunosorbent assay) and immunochromatographic tests (ICTs). We evaluated two commercial immunochromatographic tests in parallel with enzyme immunoassay, on 52 stool samples. We compared the results with those of C. difficile toxin A and B PCR. The ICT QuickStrip detected 97.7% of the isolates with a 95% confidence interval of 88.8-99.8% and the ICT Advance Strip detected 92% of the isolates with a 95% confidence interval of 83.9-97.3%. Concordance between ELISA and ICTs was good (96.2%), even if ICTs seemed to better detect toxin A (+0.8 log₁₀ ICT/ELISA and +0.9 log₁₀ ICT/PCR). This was more evident with ICT QuickStrip, showing a better overall concordance with PCR (97%) than with ICT Advance Strip (88.5%). We conclude that these ICTs were an easy to perform and useful to confirm the diagnosis of CDI.

Will they have enough fuel to make it to the pole? Whether they will have enough time on station? And if so, would they be able to land with a stretch of water to spare? These are the questions that beset US astronaut Mark Kelly as he prepares to fly his Virgin Galactic passenger spaceplane to space aboard an unmanned supply mission to the International Space Station. Virgin Galactic's new SpaceShipTwo rocket plane, which was successfully launched on Thursday, will be carried on the company's White Knight Two aircraft for nearly 22 hours to the three-day journey. This involves a fairly standard 22-hour flight to space followed by an upper stage burn to boost the rocket plane to the ISS. When SpaceShipTwo is ready to land, White Knight Two will land on the Atlantic Ocean, leaving the rocket plane to glide or drop to
