party.Q: Is there a way to pass a copy of a `std::vector` to a function when its contents have changed? I am trying to wrap the long name of a C++ iterator. The language I am using does not support short-names. I would like to give the iterator short name to be used in convenient form from the language, but inside the iterator class itself I need to refer to the long name. I am using a typedef to shorten the name (see my later edit), but I have a major issue. The problem is that the contents of a `std::vector` changes. The short name I want to give the iterator needs to refer to the same vector as the iterator I receive. This causes a problem when I need the vector's contents for some computation inside the iterator class. Example (C++11):

struct st_iterator { typedef std::vector::iterator vec_iterator; vec_iterator v_iter; std::vector v; st_iterator(std::vector v): v(v) {} // , v_iter(v.begin()) {} // this causes problems }; A: Since you are using a std::vector anyway, why not use the container itself to save any extra construction: #include <vector> struct st_iterator { std::vector::const_iterator it; st_iterator(const std::vector& v) : it(v.begin()) {} }; template <typename T> std::vector make_vector(std::initializer_list<T> l)
