Although we frequently hear about the size of the files you create and how large your images can be, the fact is that the smallest files are 1 pixel by 1 pixel, and the largest are in the millions of pixels. Perhaps even more surprising is that Photoshop can work with these files and make them an even larger size. This is where the concept of layers comes into play. After you add a layer to your image, Photoshop can work with it in the same way it would with any other file. You can add more layers, erase layers, or convert layers to other types of files. With the structure of Photoshop, you can create and combine objects on a single layer, or combine them in a different order. You can

The effect of perfluorooctanoate on serum amylase activity in mice. Perfluorooctanoate (PFOA) was identified in over 93% of US blood samples taken in the late 1990s, with the vast majority of these samples having concentrations exceeding 10 microg/L. Since its discovery in the environment, PFOA has been identified in the serum of aquatic organisms. This finding suggests that PFOA is transported in fish via the gastrointestinal tract or the gills, with direct transfer from the environment into the aquatic organism. To assess the potential transfer of PFOA from mice to humans, we monitored serum amylase activity over time following subcutaneous (s.c.) administration of PFOA. Two PFOA doses (1.44 and 8.72 mg/kg body weight) were studied. Based on previously published data, serum amylase activity was measured between 4 and 48 hours following s.c. administration of PFOA. The PFOA doses were not different in their effect on serum amylase, indicating a maximum concentration of PFOA observed in serum at 0.36 mg/L.

Q: Accessing members inside of a static class I have a class that is populated with data from a database. The contents of the class is displayed in a datagrid, and I use a binding to my database with static datasource. What I want to do is display a column that contains a member of a class inside the same static class. How can I do this? A: If this static class is your DataContext then you can do it like this: `BindingList _myBindingList = new BindingList(new[] { getDataFromDB }); BindingSource myBindingSource = new BindingSource(); myBindingSource.DataSource = _myBindingList; //this creates BindingSource for your binding myBindingSource.DataMember = "TheClass"; myBindingSource.DataPropertyName = "Text"; myBindingSource.DataSourceUpdateMode = DataSourceUpdateMode.OnPropertyChanged; myDataGridView.DataSource = myBindingSource;` Upside of using BindingList is that you don't need to make an instance of TheClass every time you want to access its member. Also, you have a

Q: SEO and crawlers The basic idea of SEO is to do not put lots of keywords on the text, because it wont be read correctly, and you need to invest in marketing instead. What about Google crawlers that crawl and interpret websites? When they crawl a page with lots of keywords will they understand it correctly and give a good idea of the content? A: Keywords are not going to affect the crawlability or SEO ranking of a page. You can link to a specific page and the crawler will pick that page up if you want it. If you add keywords to an anchor text (a link to your site) then the crawler will crawl that link (assuming it isn't blocked). If you want to use keywords to specify what sort of content you want to show the crawler, then that's fine as long as you don't have keywords repeat or overuse. Google's crawler will index and understand your content as much as you want it to understand it. The page isn't downloaded to the database, so Google can't read it before it does crawl your site.
