These in-vitro techniques are advantageous over conventional laboratory techniques. In particular, they enable studies in environments where the fluidics are different than in conventional laboratory equipment, as for example, microfluidic experiments on single cells, microfluidic experiments on biopolymers, or studies on chemical reactions under conditions where they occur on the microscale. Many of these techniques depend on high-resolution images to be acquired, or the sample to be assayed to move over time. Moving molecules, such as lipids, proteins, DNA, RNA and molecules including 6d1f23a050
