Human schistosomiasis mansoni is characterized by a life-long granulomatous response against the eggs. In endemic areas the immunity of the infected subject is associated with down-regulation of the granulomatous response, resulting in a long-lasting egg-induced chronic form of granulomatous inflammation, known as a 'Fibrous' granuloma. We set up an experimental model to study the down-regulation of angiogenesis in F1: M1 mediated granulomas induced by injection of a soluble egg antigen (SEA) in the footpad of mice. The time course of formation of F1: M1 mediated granulomas in normal, uninfected mice was similar to that observed in patients with active schistosomiasis. The granulomatous tissue was organized around an arteriole in which CD8+ T cells (effectors) surrounded by several CD4+ T cells (stimulators) presented a patchy pattern, as in the natural infection of schistosomiasis mansoni patients. Using a real-time ultrasound biomicroscope, we observed in the F1:M1 mediated granuloma that: i) on day 7 of their formation, the granuloma was vascularized and had intense echogenicity; ii) the first vessels appeared at the periphery of the granulomas; iii) the development of the granuloma vasculature was two to three times faster than in normal mice. However, as for natural infection, the decrease of echogenicity of F1:M1 mediated granulomas was observed, becoming isoechoic on day 14. This phenomenon was associated with a marked reduction in the number of microvessels in the F1:M1 granuloma. These results suggest that vasoactive agents produced by the granuloma components might be related to this down-regulation of granuloma angiogenesis.Šentjur 6d1f23a050
