1. Field of the Invention The invention relates to a phosphor material for producing light. 2. Background Art Inorganic phosphor materials are used as a light-emitting material in the field of display devices, and this is because of the properties of its light emission, such as a brightness, a luminance, and a life period, of highly reliable and high picture quality. Inorganic phosphor materials are used in cathode ray tubes, field emission displays, plasma displays, and the like, for the purpose of improvement in the properties of a display, such as a brightness, a luminance, and a life period. It is required for display devices to emit light with a satisfactory brightness and an excellent color purity. In the cathode ray tubes, a color purity in a short-wavelength region, such as visible light or ultraviolet ray, is also required. A large number of phosphor materials are now known which are suited for a cathode ray tube and a field emission display. The required properties for the phosphor materials are various, and there are many examples of limitations in the properties. For example, it is demanded that the phosphor materials have high luminance, and the life period is also demanded to be long. The inventors developed phosphor materials which could emit blue light by rhodium
