This invention relates to a gate valve having a shaft for axially shifting a gate for the opening and closing of flow passages, and a rotary cam for shifting the shaft and the gate, and more particularly to a structure for fixing the gate on the shaft. One conventional gate valve having a shaft for axially shifting the gate for the opening and closing of flow passages includes a gudgeon which is rotatably fitted in a housing. A cam is rotatably connected to the gudgeon, and a shaft which is rotatably connected to the cam has an end portion to be inserted into the gudgeon. The gate is fixed to the end portion of the shaft. However, this type of gate valve has a problem in that when the shaft is inserted into the gudgeon, both the shaft and the gudgeon are subject to deformation and their sealing surfaces are changed. It is thus necessary to take a measure to prevent the deformation. In addition, since the end portion of the shaft which is inserted into the gudgeon is formed into a shape suitable to be inserted into the gudgeon, the mounting operation of the gate valve is time consuming and troublesome. Another conventional gate valve includes a rotary cam having an inner sleeve to be slidably fitted in a housing and an outer sleeve fitted on the inner sleeve. A shaft which is a part of a valve seat and a gate is fixed to the outer sleeve of the rotary cam so that the shaft and the gate are shifted axially along the inner sleeve by the rotary cam. However, this type of gate valve has a problem in that when the outer sleeve of the rotary cam is fixed to the shaft, the outer sleeve is subject to deformation and thus its sealing surfaces are changed, and there is a concern that the sealing surfaces of the outer sleeve and the housing may be changed. In addition, since the outer sleeve is a large-sized component separate from the shaft, there is a problem in that the conventional gate valve is large in size and has a high production cost. Further, a rotary cam of a 6d1f23a050
