Packagesize:.rar,Q: Using a cronjob in FreeNAS to trigger multiple NAS-mounted block storage devices to copy themselves My server is using FreeNAS and has two NAS-mounted block storage devices, one for media and one for OS. I'd like to schedule a task to clean and copy the contents of the first one to the second when it runs a snapshot, but not to do anything else. I'm trying to do this using a cronjob. I'm able to schedule a task using cron directly, but if I try using a script like this: `run-parts -p /media/nas1/etc/cron.hourly --test` it appears that FreeNAS is trying to run a script, with the result that it is doing the following things (in what order): re-encrypting all volumes on the NAS making sure they're writable to let the script run shutting down the NAS Because of this, the copy isn't happening. (The cron job shows a timestamp of 7.17, when the NAS is still booting, so it's not actually trying to copy the media while it's shut down and running a script.) Ideally I'd like to do the copy before shutting down the NAS so it doesn't have to start it back up again. I've tried waiting until the backup has been completed (by waiting three hours after the last file was written to the other block device), but that doesn't appear to work. I could also do the copy immediately after the backup, but that seems like a waste of time. Is there a way to tell FreeNAS not to do that extra encryption and shutdown stuff while running a script? Or is there another way to get this to work that doesn't involve re-encrypting every file every time the script runs? A: You should be able to get around this using the `--console` option to the `run-parts` script to stop the script from running interactively. That will leave FreeNAS waiting for an external program like the snapshot mechanism to take its time without holding up the process.
